downloadwindowslastxpv22isoA comparative study of the activation of the N-methyl-D-aspartate receptor by D-serine in CA3 and CA1 neurons of hippocampal slices. D-Serine, one of the endogenous co-agonists of the N-methyl-D-aspartate receptor (NMDAR) can be used as a tool to investigate NMDAR-dependent synaptic plasticity in vitro. In CA3-CA1 synapses, D-serine's effects are not uniform; their shape differs as a function of the activation of two NMDAR subtypes, NR2A and NR2B, which show different distributions of the subunit composition. However, NMDAR-mediated currents (NMDA-ICs) obtained with the "split waveform" technique represent only the entire NMDAR population, since activation of NR2A-containing receptors is thought to be required for the induction of long-term potentiation (LTP), while activation of NR2B-containing receptors is thought to be a prerequisite for the occurrence of long-term depression (LTD). The purpose of this study was to determine whether CA1 neurons exhibit different LTP/LTD-related properties of the NMDAR activation by the agonist D-serine, compared to the CA3. Whole-cell patch-clamp recordings from hippocampal slices were used to compare the magnitude of NMDA-ICs in CA3 and CA1 pyram 3e33713323
