Possible Duplicate: Why the different string declaration? String declaration in C are: char s[]; char *s; char *s[] As per my understanding, in all of the cases, the size of the array is hardcoded and the actual array is of type char. So I got the following questions: What are the functions of the array for sure? Why there are different declaration like what above-mentioned? A: Arrays don't have sizes. They are fixed dimensional arrays of a specific type. The size of an array is deduced from the largest dimension of the type of its elements. So declaring char a[10]; char *b; char *c; char d; is exactly the same as: char a[10]; char *b; char *c; char d; But: int *a; is completely different, because a is an integer and int is a not "array" type. High resolution power Doppler sonography (HPRPDS) of the prostate is a new method for the noninvasive assessment of prostatic vascularity, when prostate volume of the examined organ is large. Thus, HPRPDS offers the possibility of an estimation of the grade of hypervascularization and the presence of secondary complications (e.g., chronic prostatitis or cancer). The purpose of this study was to evaluate the diagnostic accuracy of HPRPDS in the diagnosis of chronic prostatitis and chronic bacterial prostatitis as well as cancer of the prostate. The study group consisted of patients with different grade of benign prostatic hyperplasia (BPH) in the scale of Dr. D. Stamey (WHO classes I-IV). HPRPDS was performed with the use of the VOCAL (SonoAce) apparatus according to the algorithm established by the authors. The results of the examination were compared with other measures. HPRPDS allows the assessment of the grade of hypervascularization of the prostate. HPRPDS cannot, however, differentiate chronic bacterial prostatitis and chronic prostatitis without bacterial factor. HPRPDS is useful in assessing the stage of cancer development. HPRPDS of the prostate in patients with BPH can help to detect the occurrence of chronic prostatitis or cancer of the prostate.Q: What is the semantic difference between `set` and `s` in regular expressions?
