At the install,The invention relates to an apparatus for performing buoyancy compensation in a buoyancy compensating fluid. More particularly, the invention relates to an improved apparatus having a simplified mechanical assembly for minimizing fluid leakage from the working surface. In the offshore drilling and production industry, a wide variety of equipment may be mounted on the hull of a drilling or production rig. A commonly used item of such equipment is a buoyancy compensator for performing buoyancy compensation in a fluid. The buoyancy compensator is a compressed fluid filled shell containing an accumulator, or accumulator/air chamber, through which small amounts of drilling or production fluid is pumped to allow for continual changing of volume with variations in the water level. Such buoyancy compensators are commonly used in deep water where depth changes in the borehole can affect the position of the rig or other downhole equipment. The quantity of fluid is important as it affects the buoyancy of the buoyancy compensator as well as its weight. At least two different known mechanisms have been used for performing buoyancy compensation. An accumulator/air chamber
