Pregnancy in the woman with an artificial heart. Thirty-seven pregnancies were achieved in 18 patients with a Starr-Edwards (or prior model) prothesis. In 33 patients, pregnancies followed implantation of the device for at least one year. Three patients had a Starr-Edwards valve implant for less than one year, two of which were complicated by periprosthetic leakage. In these patients, 17 pregnancies resulted in 12 terminations. Three uneventful pregnancies were achieved in the same group. Of the seven pregnancies that were not complicated by valve thrombosis, five led to normal deliveries with good results. In this series, 41% of pregnancies were complicated by early pregnancy loss or premature delivery, or both, usually associated with pregnancy in the setting of abnormal intravascular volume status.
