Cp 2000,manual,gk,cheap,laptop,dvd,microsof,headphone,cd,audio,best,music,This is the first study to show that skeletal muscle loss, measured in both quantity and quality, is much more prevalent in patients with diabetes than previously thought. As a result, this study has important clinical implications, as it highlights the value of careful assessment of muscle volume in both clinical practice and clinical trials. “Clinicians should be aware of this potential problem when assessing muscle strength and quality.

In particular, the upper and lower limbs should be carefully assessed. The assessment should be quantified and conducted in a standardized manner, so that discrepancies can be highlighted and interpretation can be contextualized to patient-specific factors.” “The prevalence of weakness in people with diabetes was much greater than in the non-diabetes group, with a mean strength of 60% and 25%, respectively. Strength is also worse for the diabetic patients, suggesting that as strength declines, quality declines as well.” In 2013, the prevalence of diabetes was estimated to be 8.3%, a prevalence which is projected to rise to 10.8% in 2035. This equates to approximately 12 million people, the vast majority of whom will have diabetes. However, the high prevalence of diabetes does not come without a cost; patients with diabetes have 30% higher mortality and twice the rate of cardiovascular disease as those without diabetes. It is estimated that in the UK approximately £14 billion is spent each year on caring for the symptoms and complications associated with diabetes. “Even if patients do not complain of muscle weakness, it is clear that this condition is much more prevalent than previously thought. Our study highlights the importance of careful assessment of muscle volume, and we suggest that clinicians should conduct these assessments in a standardized manner, in order to highlight discrepancies and contextualize interpretation of results to patient-specific factors.” “This is the first study to show that skeletal muscle loss, measured in both quantity and quality, is much more prevalent in patients with diabetes than previously thought. As a result, this study has important clinical implications, as it highlights the value of careful assessment of muscle volume in both clinical practice and clinical trials.” Johan Riedel, PhD, University of Antwerp, Belgium “Patients with diabetes can lose substantial skeletal muscle tissue, as opposed to two decades ago when it
