spices impart flavor to poultry dishes. there is little information available on which processing aids or herbs are used in making spices. higher preservation temperatures and antioxidants such as tocopherols found in spices prolong shelf life. a 1999 survey by the natural products association in the united states found that, globally, the majority of spices and seasoning blends are made from blends of several individual spices [ 7 ]. campylobacter infections cause gastroenteritis and are usually transmitted by the consumption of undercooked poultry products, typically those that have been contaminated by faeces [ 8 ]. there is a marked seasonality in the incidence of campylobacter infections, with most cases occurring during the winter months. in the uk, it is the third most common cause of foodborne illness, the fourth most common cause of hospitalization and deaths from campylobacteriosis [ 9 ]. in the united states, campylobacter is the most commonly reported bacterial foodborne illness in the summer. most cases are associated with handling, consumption and preparing poultry meat [ 10 ]. commercial broilers are generally raised in deep litter pens and on small raised wire floors. in other cases, broilers are typically reared in cages with wire and solid floors. in the latter case, campylobacter is typically transmitted through faecal droppings that are shed by animals in close proximity to one another in a rearing room. because campylobacter jejuni is a thermophilic bacterium, low temperatures and high cooking temperatures, particularly above 70 °c, will limit pathogen growth [ 11 ]. broilers are typically slaughtered at approximately six weeks of age, and may then be processed into broiler, burger, ground, and other products. when harvested from a point of sale, broilers are sometimes kept at an ambient temperature between 0 °c and 5 °c. this is to reduce the potential risk of cross-contamination and to slow the pathogen growth [ 12 ]. when transport occurs in ice-boxes, temperatures may be allowed to rise above 4 °c. more information about meat safety is available in supplementary materials: meat safety – from farm to fork: a handbook for consumers 5ec8ef588b
