However, Photoshop still lacks some of the features that professionals need. I want a standard file format that supports images in every conceivable format. If I can fill out a layer's information in any photo editing software, why can't Adobe's software? I want to be able to choose the output format from within the photo editing process, rather than having to download it to another computer first. Even though I am in the business of the graphics industry, with a curatorial eye, I tend to use Photoshop for all of my day-to-day work on my computer. I use it for design and photo editing. Unfortunately, I often wish Adobe had never gotten into the original photo software business. It makes it so much easier. However, I believe that lack of photo editing software is the biggest obstacle for most people to use Photoshop to grow as a creative person. Your body of work needs to exist in at least two different places: the digital and the physical. Separate your workflow between the two. As it is, businesses are still unwilling to accept that their design and photography staffs goes where it needs to have permanent physical artifacts at all. For those of us who use Photoshop on a regular basis, the most welcome, if not biggest, change to Lightroom 5 is the Smart Preview option, which makes it easy and fast to compare your edits. On a PC, you just hold down the N key and then click to compare your work. You can also press T for three-image comparison. It's easy, fast, and cuts down on typing when comparing an image's many variations.
