Hindus/Hindus - Wikipedia The term is sometimes used to refer to Hinduism in general. Although the term in the West comes from the name of an ethnic group, it was primarily used for the various sects of Hinduism in the East. The term has also been interpreted to mean the original Hindu religion or the ideas of the Vedic scriptures and Upanishads. Most Hindus are considered to follow one of the officially recognized religions, although the term "Hinduism" is also used to refer to all the many and varied forms of Hinduism. There are two views in Hinduism about the nature of gods and goddesses in Hinduism. One is to consider every religious being as a god which is in specific invoked and worshiped, as is popular in Hindu temples, where deities are the central focus. The other is to consider all religious beings as goddesses. The latter view is more common amongst Hindus living in the West. The term Hinduism has been used to refer to several specific traditions, or "Hindu movements" in the modern day usage. Each of these has their own initiation traditions, philosophy, ethical teachings, and political ideals. God is central in Hinduism but many Hindus consider god to be not anthropomorphic as the god is non-human, formless, abstract, and impersonal. Hinduism is a polytheistic religion. It is the worship of many different gods and goddesses, who are understood in various ways to be different manifestations of the one god. Hindus are also polytheists who believe that there are many forms of the supreme god, many forms of the god's body parts (embodied in various forms of the goddess), and many forms of each god and goddess' activities in various aspects of life. In some schools, the term Hinduism is used to describe the primary religious beliefs and practices of Hindus, as well as a particular way of life (ethos), philosophy, caste and social organization. In other schools, Hinduism refers to a historical, ethnographic label or category of people that share a common worldview and are distinguished from other religious groups such as Buddhism, Jainism, Islam, Sikhism, Christianity, and Zoroastrianism. Modern Hinduism is a codification of ancient sacred texts called the Vedas, arranged into four authoritative texts called the Brahmanas, Aranyakas, Sutra and Upanishads. Hinduism's major scriptures, the Vedas and the Upanishads.
