The current major release of Photoshop is version CS6. Its original release at the Macworld Expo in January had the commonly used 'wrong' color space. After many complaints and a resubmission with the correct color space set, version CS6 was made available to the public. If everything went according to plan, updates for version CS5 and CS5.5 should come shortly after. To add a new background, let's swipe down and select New --> Other Greed. Let's then scroll through all the backgrounds in the Wizard of minimalism. Choose the image you want to add background. It can be added by selecting it and pressing the Return key on the keyboard or by clicking it. If the image has opened on the screen, let's right-click on it and then click on the full screen option. All the visible layers are available in the Layers panel. They are in the following order: (1) Background (2) Clipping Mask or layer above the background and all other layers, including the layer which is currently on the screen. Then one can adjust the color of the background, a clipping mask, or change the size and position of the background. When you close it, it can be deselected if any layer. This would give you the ability to set all the layers currently visible on your screen. A clipping mask is the background layer over an image. Because it is transparent, it can obscure the rest of the image while letting hidden parts of the image shine through. With default settings, the starting point of the Clipping Mask is at the foreground part of the image. What we need to do is set the colors to reflect a decent, neutral gray. We can select the background layer and click the little green round button. This will bring up Color Picker. Click on the color box and move to the right until the color tone is neutral. Next set the Opacity to 50%. With the Layer Brushes feature in the Layers Panel, we can add textures from our own brushes to Photoshop images. Among the different options are: Textures & Patterns, Stencils, Textures & Patterns, and other brushes are the basic brushes that we use to make our pictures more interesting, more unique and more like us.
